

The old lighthouse keeper, Silas, lived a solitary life on the windswept cliff. Every day, he'd climb the winding stairs, polish the brass lamp, and peer out at the churning sea. One stormy night, a ship, battered by the raging waves, sent out a desperate SOS. Silas, his heart pounding, scrambled to ignite the lamp. But the wind howled, and the flame flickered dangerously close to extinction. He fought against the gale, shielding the lamp with his body, his knuckles white. Finally, with a surge of adrenaline, he coaxed the flame back to life. A beacon of hope, the lighthouse beam sliced through the darkness, guiding the ship towards safety. As the storm subsided, Silas, exhausted but exhilarated, knew he had done his duty, a small guardian against the vast and unforgiving sea.